

Rachel Ball Albright joined the team in early 2011 as a Client Consultant after serving in United States Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell's leadership office as his deputy press secretary. In that capacity, Rachel played an active role on McConnell's communications team, as she was responsible for generating press materials, organizing media events, and managing news requests while representing the views of the Republican leader. Additionally, Rachel introduced more organization to the press office, developing and managing new reference systems to track McConnell's speeches and statements on major issues, as well as the resulting press coverage. Rachel's strong work ethic, attention to detail, and flexibility served her well in this role.

During her time in Washington, Rachel was accepted into a competitive bipartisan leadership training program at American University's Women and Politics Institute. The program's monthly workshops focused on campaigns and elections, political communication, fundraising, and public policy.

For the Group, Rachel manages client service for a variety of the firm's interests. Her client experience includes political and strategic relationship building, project and campaign management, and media relations.

A Lexington, Kentucky native, Rachel is a graduate of Furman University and is currently completing work on her master's degree in Leadership, Policy, and Organizations at Vanderbilt University. Rachel and her husband, Justin, live in Nashville and enjoy running, traveling, and spending time outdoors.
